

MPs

REPLACE BAD LAW

REGAIN RURAL VOTES

"MY NEW
'VIRTUE SIGNALLER' WILL TELL US, ARTHUR"

"HOW MANY STEPS WE DONE TODAY THEN
FERDIE?"

"foxhunting...
one of the domestic legislative measures I most regret.."

Tony Blair.

REPLACE BAD LAW

For our wildlife

For our rural communities

For British Cultural Heritage

REPLACE BAD LAW... TO PROTECT OUR WILDLIFE

From an animal welfare perspective, this legislation has been an unmitigated disaster. The UK fox population has plummeted by up to 50% and there is no evidence that it has improved animal welfare in any respect.

As veterinarians specialising in wildlife management have shown, the use of hounds replicates the way in which disease, injury and weakness in a prey species has been determined through the chase by wild predators. Consequently, hunting with hounds is not about numbers killed, but the health and size of a wild mammal population left alive. The result of hunting is that either the selected animal is quickly killed or escapes unscathed, with no chance of wounding.

When this disastrous legislation was passed, anti-hunting groups claimed that animal welfare would be improved. They spent millions of pounds to bring about a ban. Not one penny has been spent by those groups on investigating whether this law has had any beneficial effect at all – for the simple reason they recognise it has not.

“I left the League Against Cruel Sports when I saw – quite clearly – that animal welfare was not the reason for the Hunting Act. It is not credible to ban a method of lethal control without putting forward an alternative, and without even trying to find out what effect a Ban has had.”

Jim Barrington, former Campaigns Director, the League Against Cruel Sports

“Naturally, people ask whether we were implying that hunting is cruel. The short answer to that question is no.”

Lord Burns, responding after the Burns Inquiry on Hunting with Dogs

“Another mammal suffering from large scale declines is the Red Fox, with populations in central-southern England and eastern Wales declining by between 20% and 50%”

Study on wild mammal populations, post the ban on hunting. British Trust for Ornithology study

What's this really about?

£15M

Amount it is estimated the Animal Rights Lobby spent forcing through the UK's version of MLA Blair's 'animal welfare' legislation.

£0

Amount they have spent subsequently, on seeing if it actually did.

REPLACE BAD LAW...

TO STRENGTHEN OUR COMMUNITIES

As legislators, we should be protecting our ancient traditions, not persecuting the rural minorities who depend on them. Hunting with hounds has been an historic way of life and a pivotal part of the equine culture of Britain, for millenia. Our rural communities should be seen as a force for good and the people who live there, their customs and traditions, worth supporting and preserving for future generations. We should not seek to criminalise law abiding people.

The economic benefits of Hunting to the rural economy are significant – from veterinary practices, to farriers, to saddlers, to tailors, to sporting outfitters, to hotels, to livery yards, forage and animal feed merchants.

Celebrate diversity – don't persecute it!

In Isolated Rural Communities, hunting means stronger mental health

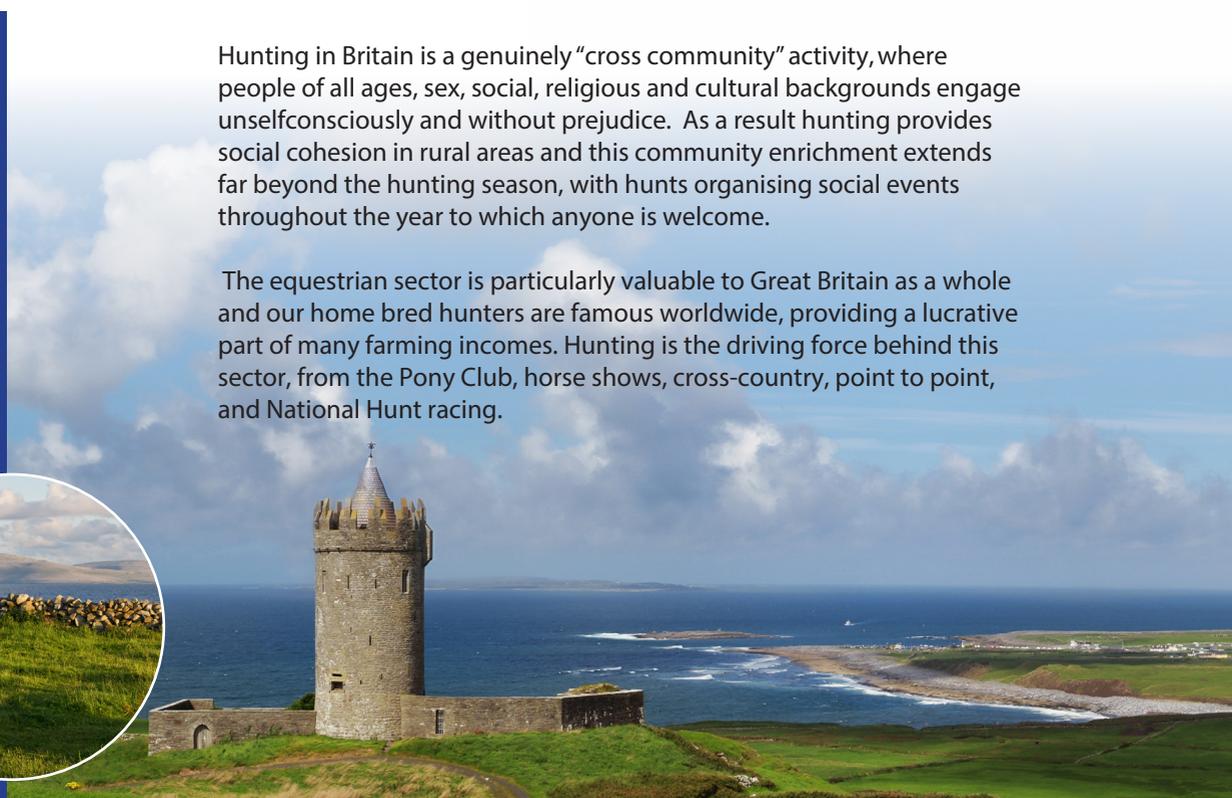

You cannot overstate the community importance that countryside sports such as hunting, hold in the social fabric of rural life. This narrow bill completely ignores the devastating impact of removing all the social interaction it brings:

- Farmers suppers
- The regular visit of the masters and hunt staff to clear country
- Gamekeepers dinners
- Weekly hunt skittles leagues in rural pubs
- Hunt Balls
- Race meetings
- Bi-weekly shoots
- Lawn meets
- Whist drives
- Sheep schemes

Hunting in Britain is a genuinely “cross community” activity, where people of all ages, sex, social, religious and cultural backgrounds engage unselfconsciously and without prejudice. As a result hunting provides social cohesion in rural areas and this community enrichment extends far beyond the hunting season, with hunts organising social events throughout the year to which anyone is welcome.

The equestrian sector is particularly valuable to Great Britain as a whole and our home bred hunters are famous worldwide, providing a lucrative part of many farming incomes. Hunting is the driving force behind this sector, from the Pony Club, horse shows, cross-country, point to point, and National Hunt racing.

REPLACE BAD LAW

TO PROTECT BRITISH CULTURAL HERITAGE

In Great Britain we are proud that we respect the rights of minorities - whoever they are. Our rural hunting community is no different. This bad law has outlawed cherished traditions, it has stamped out a much loved part of Britain's rural heritage, and it continues to persecute a small rural minority.

Replace bad law, too, because it flies directly against the direction of travel across the world, and continues to make Great Britain a laughing stock. UNESCO have defined cultural heritage as the "living expressions inherited from our ancestors and passed on to our descendants". The sound of hounds in full cry after a fox in our countryside, is as much a part of our heritage as the landscape itself.

Six months ago, the blowing of the French hunting horn was recognised by UNESCO as a cultural activity requiring protection. Further afield, in 2017, the New Zealand legislature recognised the Maori custom of pig hunting on the Whanganui River. And in 2016 Falconry received protections.

The truth is that the most divisive example of legislation affecting rural communities without due consideration, was the Hunting Act 2004.

Even the legislators and draftsmen of this law now admit it has been a failure. Daniel Greenberg, the Parliamentary Counsel who drafted the The Hunting Act, recently said "What's actually happening here, is that we are legislating against a minority on a moral issue, and I thought we didn't do that?". He's never hunted, he's not pro-hunting. In fact he's never even sat on a horse. What he recognised then was that anti-hunting legislation is different. He says:

"Instead of an effective measure, therefore, the Act and the Bills for it were largely an exercise in what it has now become fashionable to describe as "virtue signalling"

It's unworkable

Hunting is a central thread in the tapestry of rural life. Criminalising ordinary decent people does not work as a principle, with a law that has done nothing to benefit wildlife and is virtually impossible to enforce. After 700 hours of wasted parliamentary time in 2004, 17 years later this bad law has achieved nothing positive.

Replace Bad Law Regain Rural Votes

Author: Ed Swales FRGS
Hunting Kind
www.huntingkind.com

